

The Applied Physical Electronics transmitter is a compact coaxial Marx generator. Prime power for the unit is supplied via an umbilical from a high voltage power supply. The generator is configured to drive a dipole antenna (a portion of which is formed by the Marx pressure housing) directly and will emit an oscillatory waveform of a few cycles. The attached antenna will determine the frequency characteristics of the emission.